

I'm writing to comment on the NAB's request to stop satellite services, such as XM, from offering local weather and traffic?
Why should the FCC get involved in an issue where I decide whether I want to listen to my local stations for traffic & weather, or satellite radio? This seems to be an attempt by the NAB to force those in cars to listen to their stations instead of having choice. Obviously, I have a choice...pay for satellite radio or listen to the 'over-the-air' free radio.

If the NAB has their way, then should local weather, for instance offered by the Weather Channel on cable/satellite Tv be stopped from offering local weather forecasts, just because I can get the weather on my local over-the-air TV station? To me, it seems like the same issue.

Perhaps, let private individuals decide how they want to receive the weather and traffic information. This shouldn't be an FCC decided issue, but rather, an issue decided by the consumer.
